

Memo

Peter Dehne is professor for planning law and building law at the University of Applied Sciences Neubrandenburg and director of the Neubrandenburger Institute for Cooperative Regional Development. After his university degree of town and regional planning and the traineeship for urban development he was staff member in a town planning office in Berlin. His key aspects of applied sciences are the consequences of demographic change on regional development, the adoption and rebuilding of services of general interests, co-operative regional planning, strategies and policy for rural areas as well as strategic planning for small and medium-sized towns. Several research projects are oriented towards strengthening the surrounding area and anchor his University inside the region.

